Western Australia, one of the most radical states Downunder, has passed a bill that grants COVID-19 officers authorization to strip people from their homes and vaccinate them against their will.

“While a COVID-19 declaration is in force, for the purpose of limiting the spread of the SARS-CoV-2 virus, an authorised COVID-19 officer may direct any person who has been exposed, or any class of person who may have been exposed, to the SARS-CoV-2 virus to do all or any of the following,” the Western Australia bill reads.

“(a) to remain in an area specified by the officer for such period as is specified by the officer;”
“(b) to remain quarantined from other persons for such period, and in such reasonable manner, as is specified by the officer;”

“(c) to submit to infection prevention and control procedures within such reasonable period, and in such reasonable manner, as is specified by the officer.”

Earlier this month, Australia dropped its quarantine requirements for people exposed to the virus, effective October 14. Mandatory isolation was one of the last restrictions to be lifted.

But this new bill suggests that if another COVID emergency is declared, Western Australians could be forcefully removed from their own homes and compelled to “submit” to whatever “infection prevention and control procedures” are deemed “reasonable.”

Although forced vaccination isn’t directly stated in the bill, the bill’s vague wording leaves it open to such interpretation.

Canada never mandated forced vaccination, though the coercive mandates were effective in attaining one of the highest vaccination rates in the world.

At one point, newly elected Quebec Premier Francois Legault proposed a tax on unvaccinated people. After widespread backlash from the public and civil rights groups, the idea was subsequently dropped.
